

Oh No! They Won't Go!

California may have a new problem. It seems that a Federal Judge and California Governor Swarzenegger have decided to release thousands of State Prison Inmates back into society. Somehow word of what its like on the "outside" in California seems to have seeped into the protective environment of our penal system.

As prisoners start calculating that they will be trading a life of free meals, free healthcare, lots of leisure time with their friends, no taxes and no responsibilities for what the rest of us face on a daily basis, I've got a question. What if they won't go? What happens if we force them to leave and in their desperation to get back "inside" they commit new crimes and then calmly remain at the scene of the crime demanding to be put back where the "livin' is easy"?

One idea might be that instead of releasing them, we transfer them to "Gitmo" (Guantanamo Bay - Cuba). That way the Federal Government can release them and they (the Feds) will pay for relocating them to Bermuda, Palau or some other island paradise as they have done with many of the "detainees" (spelled "terrorists") that they have set free in recent weeks. Its an idea that works for me!
